The results of a test are considered ‘inconclusive’ if the tester cannot determine whether the test has passed or failed. It is distinguished from a ‘blocked’ test case because an inconclusive test can be run as written in the test case description, but its results are ambiguous.