Ghosting is a technique used to create a backup copy of a hard disk on removable media or a network that can restore a computer to the exact configuration it had when the ghost image was created. This can be used in software testing to isolate a bug in the precise environment in which it was discovered.