

System testing is testing done after all the units of a system have been integrated. The purpose of system testing is to confirm that the software satisfies all of its requirements. System testing may involve many different types of testing, though they will be mostly black-box methods. Some testing types that fall under the heading of system testing are functionality, usability, availability, and performance testing.