

A non-disclosure agreement, or NDA, is a contract between two parties by which one party agrees to protect confidential information entrusted to it by the other party.

Software developers are often required to sign an NDA before they are given access to restricted materials about a product.